

Advancing art therapy to restore and enhance lives

Use of Art Therapy in the Treatment of Veterans

What Veterans Say About Art Therapy

Veterans who participate in art therapy find ongoing mutual support; learn to understand and cope with symptoms; enhance their strengths and abilities to reenter their communities; and improve their outlook on life. Here are a few quotes from our nation's military about the value of art therapy:

Roy Meaders of Topeka, KS, a Veteran who spent four and one-half months in Vietnam, and who was awarded the CIB Purple Heart and Bronze Star writes: "Art therapy gave me a no threatening place for social interaction. But more than that, it helped me to express my feelings through my art work and has given me confidence to pursue other activities, helped me to develop the skill needed to become an accomplished artist. It also gave me the right to meet my congressman, and to speak to the national news broadcast. [Art therapy] changed my life and the lives of my PTSD peers."

Steve Piscatelli, a Viet Nam Veteran worked for several years with doctors who wanted to explore his

August, 2009

About Art Therapy

Art therapy can be beneficial to people of all ages, including adults who have emotional, cognitive, and /or physical disabilities. Our nation's Veterans often return home with acute psychological or medical conditions that impair functioning, family relationships, and reentry into the workforce. Others may develop chronic disorders that require months or even years of counseling or rehabilitation. For Veterans who are receiving psychiatric care, art therapy can be an effective form of treatment, either as an adjunct to other therapies or as a form of individual or group psychotherapy.

Former Senator Bob Graham (FL) emphasized value of art therapy with US Veterans in The Congressional Record, stating: "Art therapists provide effective treatment and health maintenance intervention for Veterans, focusing on all of their life challenges, such as mental, physical, and cognitive impairments. Intense emotion and memory, often difficult to convey in words, often are more easily expressed in images with the guidance of a trained clinician...Given the number of Veterans gradually returning from the current war in Iraq, art therapy has the potential to assist them as a form of rehabilitation."

Members of the American Art Therapy Association hope that the following information will give you a greater understanding of how art therapy can be used in the treatment of our nation's Veterans and has unique value in enhancing and improving mental health.

How Art Therapy Helps Veterans

Art therapy helps Veterans in a variety of ways, including:

For Veterans with mental health needs, art therapy provides emotional relief by encouraging expression of childhood. Piscatelli recalls that they "couldn't hear him when I tried to tell them: combat broke me down." Doctors then consulted with art therapist Deborah Golub who helped Piscatelli express the horrific experiences he encountered through pictures, paintings, and sculptures of specific combat incidents. When the medical staff saw the artwork, then they finally understood. He says, "If art therapy programs had been there when I returned from Viet Nam, I would have taken advantage of them and would most likely be able to work today, but I suffered with it too long. Not only would art therapy have helped me it would have saved a lot of money in the long run. If I hadn't found art therapy I would probably have committed suicide. Needed art therapy to purge the horrific experiences. So many returning veterans did commit suicide." Piscatelli goes on to recommend, "The government should have reentry programs with art therapy— it works wonders. You have to purge the sound, the smell, the feel in your fingers otherwise You grit your teeth and might end up exploding. There are good men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan that need to get the poisons out, clean the wounds of war— it will help them talk about and purge the gruesome events so that they can heal. The faster you get art therapy treatment the fewer problems there are down the road— and you need follow-up— that's the operant word, follow-up art therapy is very important too."

Courtesy of The Washington Post, April 15, 2007: Eric Edmondson, a newly returned soldier writes, "I cannot express in words what I remember about the fall day in Iraq 18 months ago when a roadside bomb and then a heart attack left me with shrapnel feelings and concerns. Art making has been observed to relieve depression and anxiety as well as to improve orientation to reality. Many patients have increased levels of self-confidence and self-esteem through engaging in creative activities.

For Veterans seeking treatment for substance abuse, specific art techniques can help patients understand the need for treatment, accept their powerlessness over addictive substances, and make a personal commitment to their sobriety. Art therapy is used to supplement traditional twelve step programs and helps Veterans with substance abuse problems to achieve personal insights, identify strengths and deficits, and experience a sense of spirituality through self-reflection.

In assisted care and hospices, art therapy adds to the overall quality of life of our nation's Veterans. In these settings, art therapists capitalize on the strengths, courage, and pride of military personnel, helping them to create visual records of their histories, memories, and legacies. Art therapy techniques in these facilities often involve creating visual autobiographies, writing life stories, and illustrating memoirs, in addition to art experiences to sustain cognitive skills and enhance stress reduction.

For Veterans undergoing physical rehabilitation, creating artwork can help promote fine motor skills. Art therapists may recommend specific interventions to help Veterans reconcile physical changes and injuries, design art making experiences that reinforce physical skills, and develop programs to help them discover new strengths. Currently, art therapists and researchers are studying the value of art therapy in treating posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), a problem experienced by many combat Veterans returning from the recent conflicts in the Middle East and military from previous wars. For returning military suffering from PTSD, art therapy is used to help reduce debilitating symptoms, provide opportunities for expression of painful memories, and enhance stress reduction through art-based relaxation techniques and behavioral skills.

Art Therapy in Veterans Hospitals

Art therapy has been a valuable component of services offered by Veteran's Hospitals (VA) since 1945 when the Winter VA Hospital in Topeka, KS first offered art therapy wounds and brain damage.” The 26-year-old veteran is no longer able to eat, walk or talk. But he can pick up a paint brush. When he does, his father sees in the former Army sergeant's face glimmers of memory and healing as he seeks to paint his thoughts on blank paper. "I can tell by his expression he's enjoying it," Ed Edmondson said of the art therapy class Eric has taken in the weeks since he left a Veterans Affairs hospital in Richmond for a private rehabilitation center in Chicago. "I don't care what it looks like. It's beautiful to me."

The Washington Post's Jackie Spinner, staff writer, summarizes the value of art therapy, stating: "Veterans with traumatic combat injuries often find healing power in art. They communicate through pencil and charcoal drawings, sculpture and painting. Their images range from calm, colorful landscapes to mangled vehicles, prisoners and carnage. It's a therapy recognized as especially helpful to those with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

as part of their psychiatric services to returning World War II veterans. By 1980, a job series was established to facilitate the hiring of arts therapists nationwide-- the GS638 series for Creative Arts Therapists and Recreation Therapists. Today, art therapists are employed in VA hospitals or offer therapeutic services to military personnel and their families in hospitals such as Walter Reed in Washington, DC, clinics, mental health programs, or private practice. Depending on their credentials, many art therapists provide services to military personnel through TRICARE, managed health care and resources for active, reserves, and retired service members.

How Does Art Therapy Compare with Other Therapies?

Art therapists are Master's level professionals who have a degree in art therapy or a related field. They generally hold a credential in the field of art therapy such as Registration (ATR) or Board Certification (ATR-BC). Many art therapists also hold an additional license in counseling, psychology, or marriage and family therapy. Art therapists are skilled in using a variety of art modalities (drawing, painting, sculpture, and other media) in assessment and treatment and the clinical application of methods of psychotherapy and counseling to achieve goals and objectives. Like other forms of psychotherapy or counseling, art therapists may use a specific approach or theory. For example, an art therapist working with a Veteran with PTSD may combine drawing and collage activities with cognitive-behavioral therapy to help the individual reduce symptoms and reframe negative thinking. Or, a practitioner may use a humanistic approach such as person centered counseling to enhance a Veteran's personal strengths and sense of self-worth through the creative process.

As a form of rehabilitation, art therapy promotes social skills and cognitive and physical functioning. In VA hospitals, art therapists may work in activity therapy departments to help Veterans make drawings, paintings, and sculptures for personal satisfaction or artwork to share with the public through shows like the National Veterans Creative Arts Festival. These unique aspects of art therapy help Veterans find value and meaning in their creative expressions, engage in purposeful activities, and improve the overall quality of their lives.

Art therapists use a wide variety of art-based techniques in the assessment and treatment of adults. For military returning from combat or veterans of previous wars

For more information on art therapy with Veterans, please contact us.

American Art Therapy Association
225 North Fairfax Street
Alexandria, VA 22314

Telephone:
1+888- 290-0878 or
703-548-5861

Email:
info@arttherapy.org

Website:
www.americanarttherapyassociation.org

and conflicts, art therapy provides an outlet for expression of feelings and experiences that are difficult to express verbally. As a form of psychotherapy, art therapy can help veterans communicate traumatic memories, relieve stress, and reduce symptoms of trauma related disorders.

Art therapists encourage their patients to reflect on the meaning of their artwork to assist their psychological recovery insight, and functioning.

For those veterans in extended care facilities or hospitals, art therapy helps to enhance the quality of life by providing a meaningful creative vocation to improve self-esteem and increase personal self-worth. Based on their knowledge of art materials, human development, and physical, mental and emotional disorders, art therapists choose specific drawing, painting, or sculpting activities to augment cognitive, psychological, and physical rehabilitation.

The American Art Therapy Association is dedicated to initiating art therapy programs that will help our newly returned combat military and our nation's Veterans recover emotionally, cognitively, and physically. In particular, the Association is committed to the development of outcome research that will ameliorate the effects of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and other mental health problems Veteran's experience as a result of active combat. Our national initiative is to provide military with access to art therapy services in Veterans Administration Hospitals as well as clinics, medical centers, and other facilities where Veterans receive treatment.